This study of a point in the musical history of America that has been rather strangely overlooked is an expansion of a paper prepared for the International Council held in Boston on June 29-July 6, 1920, and also given, in a revised form, before the Connecticut Historical Society on October 5, 1920.

Thanks are due Mr. John Albree, of Boston, for kind permission to make reproductions from his copy of Ainsworth's Psalter, and to him and Rev. Dr. Louis F. Benson, of Philadelphia, for valuable assistance in other ways.

Title-page of the Pilgrim Psalter, First Edition (reduced)

THE many Tercentenary Celebrations during 1920 of the coming of the Pilgrims to Plymouth in 1620 have called fresh attention to that historic migration. In such commemorations the accent naturally falls upon those religious and political ideas in the minds of the pioneers which they proceeded to put into practice in the new settlement. Naturally, also, the strength and nobility of their personal character are exalted, for the leaders and most of their associates were surely notable figures, eminently fit to be founders of a new commonwealth.

Unfortunately, the disasters that befell the infant colony were quick and sharp, so that presently Plymouth was overshadowed by the larger and more fortunate Puritan plantations to the north, representing a somewhat different set of impulses, though of a related class. The settlers about what is now Boston were so much more numerous than those whom plague and famine spared at Plymouth, and the development of the Puritan colony of Massachusetts Bay was so much more positive and influential, that it is not altogether strange that popular thought to-day tends to confound the two undertakings and unconsciously to extend to Plymouth whatever facts or traditions belong to Boston and its neighborhood. Thus in trying to draw a picture of the actual life in Plymouth it is not uncommon to find details in the later life of the Puritans assumed to be true also of the ways of the Pilgrims. To offset this prevalent habit of thought it is useful to magnify whatever we can recover of the distinctive peculiarities of the Plymouth settlement.

It is surprising that there is so little intelligent reference to the musical side of Plymouth life. It is true that we do not know how many of the early settlers there were musically gifted, and we have no record of how the actual practice of singing was kept up in the first critical years. But we do know that song in worship was one of their cherished and characteristic customs. And we do know just what music they brought with them. We cannot be wrong, also, in drawing inferences from that passage in Edward Winslow's Hypocrisie Unmasked (1646) in which he describes with no little pathos how on July 20/30, 1620, the large Leyden congregation bade farewell to those of their number who were setting out, by way of England, for the untried shores of America:

They that stayed at Leyden feasted us that were to go at our pastor's house, [it] being large; where we refreshed ourselves, after tears, with singing of Psalms, making joyful melody in our hearts as well as with the voice, there being many of our congregation very expert in music; and indeed it was the sweetest melody that ever mine ears heard.

It is to be remembered that throughout the 16th and 17th centuries English Protestants based their congregational singing upon metrical versions of the Psalms. All early service-books of this kind were 'Psalm-Books'. These were not supplemented or displaced by 'Hymn-Books' until the 18th century. The first complete metrical Psalter in English was that commonly known as 'Sternhold and Hopkins' (so called because begun before 1550 by Thomas Sternhold and finally edited by a committee of which John Hopkins was chairman). This was first published in 1562.

In 1564 it was followed by a Scottish variant, based in general upon the same material, but with extensive differences. These two books dominated the British field for a century or more. In Scotland the historic 'Scottish Psalter' did not come in till 1650, and in England 'Tate and Brady' or 'The New Version' did not begin to bid for approbation before 1696. Meanwhile, as successive colonies were planted in the New World they all brought over the English Sternhold and Hopkins except the colony that came to Plymouth.

The Psalter brought to Plymouth was one specially prepared for the fugitive congregations of 'Separatists' in Holland by Henry Ainsworth and published in Amsterdam in 1612. This book was also adopted at Salem and used there for about a generation. At Plymouth it was maintained much longer, certainly until after the Pilgrim settlement was merged with Massachusetts Bay in 1692. It was then replaced by what we now know as 'The Bay Psalm-Book', which was a new American book, published at Cambridge in 1640, much revised about 1650 and often reprinted later. This 'New England Version' long remained the characteristic American Psalter, and as such has received a large amount of attention — not always with much discrimination. Yet Ainsworth's Psalter was in practical use at Plymouth many years earlier, and has much more intrinsic importance than the Bay Psalm-Book ever had. It is remarkable, therefore, that Ainsworth has had so little consideration.

A few words should be said about the compiler or author. Henry Ainsworth stands forth among those who earliest underwent religious exile from England in Holland as (to quote Dr. Dexter's estimate) 'their finest character, who left the richest deposit in literature, and who for his humility and sweetness deserves worthiest remembrance.' He was born near Norwich about 1570, studied four years at Cambridge, probably in London became active in the 'Separatist' sect, suffered hardship for his opinions, and in 1593 fled for liberty to Amsterdam. For a time he seems to have been in much poverty and is said to have worked in a Dutch book-shop as a common porter. In process of time, however, he naturally became a leader, and, especially after 1610, was recognized as the honored 'teacher' of the principal congregation in Amsterdam, the one with which those who later became the Pilgrims had fairly amicable relations before they settled in Leyden in 1609. Ainsworth was a vigorous controversialist as well as an able Biblical scholar. He is now most remembered because of his Hebrew learning. His various commentaries on the Old Testament were collected in 1627 and have often been republished. He died in 1623, somewhat over fifty years old.

Ainsworth's Psalter is an octavo volume of iv, 342 pages, set up and printed with notable care. Its significance as the first real competitor of Sternhold and Hopkins is attested by the fact that later editions came out in 1617, 1626, 1639, 1644 and 1690. Of the first edition of 1612 I have heard of less than ten copies in America — in the Boston Public Library, Boston University, the Congregational Library of Boston, the American Antiquarian Society in Worcester, Yale University, the Hartford Theological Seminary in Hartford, and the rest in private hands. It is likely that there are one or two more. Whether any of these copies was actually used at Plymouth I do not know. The main circulation of the book was in Holland and England.

This book has interest in four distinct directions, each of which might claim extended exposition. In the first place, it presents a complete new translation in prose, which is important because made by a competent scholar at almost exactly the same time with the 'King James' or 'Authorized' Version of 1611. In the second place, the rendering of each Psalm is accompanied by many pithy notes or comments on the text, illustrating the author's commonsense as a Biblical critic. In the third place, side by side with the prose renderings are metrical arrangements of them, adapting the entire translation for use in common song. In the fourth place, there is a series of nearly forty tunes, quaintly set forth in melody only, after the fashion of the time.

It is upon the last of these features that I would here fix attention, with whatever may be necessary of the third. The book has by no means been forgotten in its relation to Biblical scholarship, but its peculiar significance as a song-manual should not be overlooked.

In passing, however, a word should be said about the literary quality of the book. The style is concise and nervous, with not a few quaintnesses and some angularities, but on the whole fairly well illustrating that virile period when modern English was being forged by such masters as Bacon and Shakespeare into a mighty weapon of expressional force and brilliance. As a specimen of the prose renderings we may quote that of the 23rd Psalm: —

Jehovah feedeth me; I shall not lack. In folds of budding grass
He maketh me lie down; He easily leadeth me by the waters of rests.
He returneth my soul; He leadeth me in the beaten paths of justice for His name sake. Yea, though I should walk in the vally of the shade of death, I wil not fear evil; for Thou wilt be with me; Thy rod and Thy staff, they shall comfort me. Thou furnishest before me a table in presence of my distressers; Thou makest fat my head with oil; my cup is abundant. Doubtless good and mercy shal solow me al the dayes of my life, and I shal converse in the howse of Jehovah to length of dayes.

To this we may add a single stanza of the verse to show how the prose is turned into meter: —

Jehovah feedeth me, I shal not lack;
In grassy folds He down dooth make me lye;
He gently leads me quiet waters by.
He dooth return my soul; for His name sake
In paths of justice leads me quietly.

Quoting this stanza reminds us that the music cannot be considered apart from the verse. The two are vitally interdependent. In all early Protestant song, whether in England or France or Germany, we observe certain prevalent types of verse being united with the available types of melody that went with them. In this particular Psalter there was probably little or nothing in either verse or music that was absolutely novel, though in both particulars it differs notably from English usage as then established. The book was made in Holland for an exotic group of English folk temporarily sojourning there. From England they had of course brought the song-usages that had been gradually forming since the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign. But in Holland they were in close contact with the mingled French and Dutch usages of the Reformed Churches in the Low Countries. In Ainsworth, then, we are not surprised to find a unique blend of styles, including a large proportion of French forms. It was this unique blend that was conveyed across the Atlantic in 1620. The transplanted vine of song, as we shall see, had not the strength to strike root permanently. Other plantings thrived more readily. So it came about that what the first-comers brought and for a time watched over with devoted reverence had fallen into more or less oblivion by the time their grandchildren came upon the stage.

The versification in Ainsworth is uniformly iambic, as in all the early English metrical Psalters, though with some licences that slightly relieve the monotony. As contrasted with our modern hymnody, we are at once struck by the entire absence of energetic trochaic measures. In 1612 these were quite unknown or at least unused in practical psalmody. They did not come in until more than a century later, when in 1739 Charles Wesley took up the lyre. Slightly associated with this is the further fact that only very rarely do the lines have a 'feminine' ending (only found in Pss. 45, 50 and 136). Both of these points directly affected the form of the music.

In reading the stanzas aloud, by the way, we need to remember that in 1612 English pronunciation was probably no more absolutely fixed than was English spelling. Some words of French origin may have retained at least a Gallic accent, if not a Gallic vocalization. Many longer words were often split up into all the syllables possible — as 'salvati-on' and even 'cogitati-on famil-i-ar' (Ps. 139). 'Jehovah' was certainly called 'Jehovay', 'Jah' 'Jay' and 'Selah' 'Selay'.

There is a (to us) surprising preference for long stanzas, just as in many of the early German hymns. Hardly more than one Psalm in ten is cast in the brief four-line pattern that is now often supposed to be typical of the 'old' psalmody. Here, again, we must remind ourselves that the so-called 'short' stanza and tune did not become dominant in English usage at first. In Ainsworth fully half of the Psalms are in eight-line stanzas, while thirty-four of the remainder have six lines and eleven have five lines. Three actually have twelve lines. All this means that the prevailing types of melody were extended rather than condensed. During the 17th century 'short' tunes became the rule, doubtless because they cost less effort of memory and of voice, and their supremacy then lasted until far into the 19th. Even yet there are those who regard 'Dundee' (which is of the same period as Ainsworth) or 'St. Ann's' (which is a century later) as indicating the initial type of English tune. It is true that the prejudice in favor of the syllable-formula 8-6-8-6 (the 'ballad meter' or 'common meter') was somewhat firmly seated before 1600, and that during the 17th century practically all tunes came to be adjusted to this meter or one of its near relatives. Here in America, when in 1698 the Bay Psalm-Book first came to include music, practically all the tunes were of this one class. But in Ainsworth we are in the presence of a very different taste. It is curious that only within a comparatively recent period have English and American churches begun to take up again the elaborated verse-forms and the extended melodies that were common in the thought of the Pilgrims.

In Ainsworth, as in all other early Psalters until Tate and Brady, there is little care for beauty of verbal effect. Many passages seem rough and awkward to our ears, and not a few of the rhymes are harsh. The one aim was to get the whole substance of the prose text into meter without abridgment and with all possible brevity.

Many more comments might be made about the features of the verse. But we must hasten on to the musical features.

Regarding the sources of the music Ainsworth has this to offer: —

Tunes for the Psalms I find none set of God; so that each people is to use the most grave, decent and comfortable manner of singing that they know. . . . The singing-notes, therefore, I have most taken from our former Englished Psalms, when they will fit the measure of the verse. And for the other long verses I have also taken (for the most part) the gravest and easiest tunes of the French and Dutch Psalmes.

After the custom of the time, only the melodies are given, set in the old 'square' notes. The notes used are regularly in but three values, in the body of the tunes only semibreves and minims (♢ and ↓), but with a 'long' (≡) always at the end. The C-clef is the only one used, placed on the staff according to the pitch and range of the melody — usually on the fourth line or third line, but occasionally on the second (Pss. 13 and 32) or even the first (Ps. 35=77). A flat is often added in the signature, and flats are somewhat introduced as accidentals. Sharps, however, are never used (perhaps because the font at hand did not contain them), though in numerous cases they were undoubtedly supplied mentally — as parallel versions in other books indicate. The music-type that Ainsworth found available was not as clear or positive as might be desired, so that some of the melodies, especially in their fitting to the words below them, are hard to read rapidly. But the proof-reading seems remarkably careful. Regarding this typography we naturally recall Longfellow's graceful reference in 'The Courtship of Miles Standish', at the point where John Alden, on the way with the Captain's message, finds Priscilla singing —

Open wide on her lap lay the well-worn psalm-book of Ainsworth,
Printed in Amsterdam, the words and the music together,
Rough-hewn, angular notes, like stones in the wall of a churchyard,
Darkened and overhung by the running vine of the verses.

In his description of Priscilla singing the 100th Psalm Longfellow seems to show a fine sense of the look of the book as it was. Somewhere he might have woven into his picture the hint that Priscilla, with her presumably French blood, may be supposed to have had a peculiar sympathy with the many French melodies in Ainsworth.

Apparently there are forty-eight tunes, scattered about without much plan. Where no tune is given, there is a cross-reference, like 'Sing this as the 18. Psalm'. But the forty-eight prove to include nine duplicates, so that the actual number is thirty-nine.

These represent in all fifteen different types of stanza or 'meters', as follows: —

(4 lines)	S. M. (6686)	Ps. 21.
	C. M. (8686)	Pss. 15, 54.
	L. M. (8888)	Pss. 5, 33 (=81, 104), 66, 100.
	10s.	Pss. 3 (=86), 25, 37, 97.
(5 lines)	10s.	Pss. 8, 35 (=77).
(6 lines)	L. M. (8888,88)	Ps. 34.
	L. P. M. (888,888)	Ps. 60.
	10s.	Pss. 18 (=69), 45, 53, 111.
	10s, 11s.	Ps. 50.
(7 lines)	6s, 4. (6666,4,66)	Ps. 108.

(8 lines) C. M. D.	Pss. 1 (=68), 7 (=74), 22, 24, 27 (=106), 39, 42, 44, 59, 89.
L. M. D.	Pss. 32, 51, 75.
108, D.	Pss. 55, 78, 119.
(9 lines) 68.	Ps. 13.
(12 lines) L. P. M. D.	Ps. 84 (=136, with every third line condensed).

I have not had the means of absolutely checking up these tunes with all the other books of the period. At least half of them, as is implied in Ainsworth's Preface, can be found in one or both of the two Sternhold and Hopkins versions. It is safe to assume that much more than a majority of all are of French origin, since many melodies already in English use were taken from the Genevan Psalters. This is certainly true of the two that linger in modern hymnals — 'Old 100th' and 'Old 124th' (or 'Toulon'), the latter of which now known only with one of its five lines omitted [this tune here appears as Ps. 8]. Those that seem least likely to be English in either origin or use are Pss. 3, 13, 18, 25, 33, 35, 37, 39, 45, 53, 55, 60, 66, 78, 84, 97, 111 and 119. Almost every one of these is extended, and most of them are fitted to ten-syllable lines. Ainsworth's notably abundant use of these long pentameter forms is plainly due to his desire to avail himself of the many fine French melodies at hand. The French Psalters were in this regard strikingly different from the English.

The mode of the melodies is minor in three out of every four cases. Those that are to be counted as major include Pss. 5, 8, 24, 37, 39, 44, 84 (=136), 97, 100, 108 and 119. A few were probably conceived in a Gregorian scale not quite like our modern minor. The difficulty is that in all the minors, as well as in one or two of those assumed to be major, and repeatedly where modulation seems to take place, we cannot tell with absolute certainty how far the seventh degree was sharpened in singing or just how the sixth degree was treated in consequence. It is likely that, unless collateral evidence of some sort is forthcoming, the precise interpretation of some melodies will vary with different observers, and there are even cases where two diverse interpretations seem almost equally attractive.

It would be very wrong to imagine that these tunes conform to the rigid and artificial rhythmic regularity that became the fashion in all Protestant psalmody during the 17th century — a stiff heaviness that we are now too apt to think was the original characteristic of this whole type of song. In these, as in other early tunes generally, there almost certainly ran originally a sustained vivacity, variety and vigor akin to our modern notion of a glee or part-song. In Ainsworth there is not a single tune in even or uniform notes. Three-quarters of the 252 lines begin with a long note, sometimes three or five. One-quarter begin with a short note, sometimes more than one. Every real line ends with a long note, often three. But within the lines the schemes of longs and shorts vary considerably — not capriciously, but with evident attention to the interest there is in changing patterns. All told, there are nearly forty-five distinct line-rhythms, a few of them quite unknown in present tune-writing. Comparison with other books shows that the dispositions of accent and quantity were intentional and established. As a whole, this music represents the folk-song style, with its symmetrical and echoing lines, each with a definite unity and all fused into a total enveloping unity. But it is folk-song that has retained great freedom of inner structure. It may be that these thirty-nine melodies illustrate more than one strain of folk-song tradition.

For example, there are eight different rhythms for six-syllable lines, among them the curious 'snap' form found in Ps. 24, lines b, d, f, h, and in 54, line d. For eight-syllable lines there are no less than twenty rhythms, including peculiar forms like those in 60*ad*, or in 54*a*, or in 75*bd*, the first two of which also include a 'snap' effect. Ten-syllable lines are treated in fifteen rhythms, including two with a 'snap' in 8*c* and in 18*b*. What is here called a 'snap' is an accented short note followed by a long one, producing a syncopation that is often effective, though a trifle disconcerting to the unwary singer to-day. This whole subject merits much greater analysis than can here be undertaken. If followed out in detail, it probably strengthens the view that Ainsworth is much affected by the French traditions of song that were not altogether acceptable to English editors, though many of them were incorporated into the Scottish editions of Sternhold and Hopkins.

These melodies were undoubtedly meant to be sung in unison, led by the men's voices, since the melody is set for the 'tenor'. Whatever may have been true of the two or three hundred members of the original congregation in Leyden, as evidenced by Winslow's remark previously quoted, it is not likely that the hundred Pilgrims who came to Plymouth did much singing in parts. In England, to be sure, there had been harmonized versions of Psalter music published as early as 1563 (Day), with others in 1579 (Damon), 1592 (Este) and 1599 (Allison). In Scotland they did not come in till 1635. It is not clear, however, that any of these much affected the practice of congregations generally. If the melody was thus supported, it would be by a 'bass' below, an 'alto' (or 'high' part) above, and perhaps a 'treble' (or 'third' part) above that. The transfer of leadership to the upper women's voices did not become established till long after 1612. We may reasonably conjecture that whatever part-singing was attempted was more contrapuntal in impulse than harmonic, with more attention, that is, to the combined 'run' of the voices among themselves than for the complete chord-sequences as such, though at this period, especially with melodies of this folk-song class, the latter were coming into decided prominence.

In regarding all melodies of these old days we must not forget that the Pilgrims moved in a song-atmosphere quite different from that which is common to-day. Melodies were mostly caught by ear and caught from an actual singing-voice, not from an organ, harpsichord or similar instrument. They were thought as pure melodies, not as contours of a flowing stream of keyboard harmony. And they were amalgamated with actual words, text and tune standing as one indissoluble unity. Doubtless, too, to these old singers, because they were singers, every melodic interval, every scale-tone as such and every turn in the rhythmic accent and movement had point and meaning to a degree of intensity that is rare in popular feeling to-day. We can recover the artistic color of these old songs only through the help of some specially sympathetic interpretation by a trained vocal interpreter, or, failing that, through some dextrous addition of the chord-effects that we now expect as a matter of course. In all attempts at reproduction careful attention is due to the shaping and animating force of the varying line-rhythms, and these deserve in many cases to be studied with reference to their derivation from the vigorous movements of the sprightly folk-dance. It may be guessed that the tempo originally was not slow or heavy but lively and sparkling, and that the accents were full and hearty.

Thus regarded and handled, these old tunes prove anything but monotonous or dolorous, or even very strange to our taste. Many of them turn out to be true works of simple art, not only admirably adapted to their purpose, but appealing to any healthy appreciation. Yet, at the best, we cannot be sure that we can fully enter into their spirit. We no longer have quite the same religious absorption in the belief that with the Psalms for text we are singing what the very hand of God wrote for the perpetual use of His people. And, on the musical side, we no longer have the subconscious sense of those medieval or ecclesiastical modes that were still vital and potent in the minds of singers in the Elizabethan era, with the shadowy atmosphere of tone-relations that hung about them like a delicate aura.

As has been said, it is unlikely that any of the Ainsworth tunes were new or even freshly adapted. Many of them can be traced back into the 16th century in various English and French Psalters. Their primary significance lies not in their being in any way extraordinary, but in the fact that this particular sheaf of sacred songs was in the hands and hearts of the little band of New England pioneers. If the venture at Plymouth had been practically more successful, and if Plymouth had become the civil and religious center of New England, the story of our early psalmody might have been quite different from what it was, just as its political and social development might also have been different. For this reason alone it is worth while to have these melodies made accessible by reprinting them in full.

But there is another reason. In music-history it is customary to emphasize the time about 1600 as that in which modern conceptions of structure and effect began to replace those of the medieval period. In particular, this was the time when the dramatic recitative and arioso began to be recognized, leading in just the years when Ainsworth was evolving his Psalter to the launching of the complex entertainment that we call the 'opera' (Monteverdi's 'Orfeo' was produced in 1603 and his 'Arianna' in 1608, and he went to Venice in 1613). One of the prime factors in the momentous shift that was taking place in all artistic music was the spontaneous vitality that was being discovered in the popular songs of several countries. It was from this general treasury of popular songs that the new Protestant movement adopted or adapted its tunes for religious uses. This was alike true in Germany, in Switzerland and France, down the Rhine Valley and in the Low Countries, and across the Channel in England. The first stage of this special development extended toward the middle or even the end of the 17th century. It then passed over into a second stage, especially in Germany, when the varied original materials were worked over into the more sophisticated type of the traditional 'chorale' and then became the basis for a fresh contrapuntal and instrumental development, culminating in the first half of the 18th century in the sublime work of the great Bach. The manifold interest and importance of this second stage tends to hide from view the charm of the initial stage that preceded it. Anything, therefore, which brings back to memory the quality of the original songs of Protestantism has value. No one would exalt the music of the Ainsworth Psalter as in the least conspicuous or important in this total historic movement. But it is an interesting bit of concrete evidence. This Psalter is one of a considerable number before 1650 that preserve the naive freshness of song that was characteristic of Protestantism at its youthful stage.

In view of what this Ainsworth music was one wonders that instead of exerting some perceptible influence in its American habitat it practically vanished from popular memory. By about 1700 it appears that but one of its tunes remained in common use — 'Old 100th' — and this only because established in usage through other books. There were some later efforts at intervals to recover a few more, but they accomplished nothing significant.

One reason was that Ainsworth was the book of Plymouth rather than of Boston. Its prestige was quite overshadowed by that of the Puritan 'Bay Psalm-Book' and the tunes from the English Sternhold and Hopkins that were associated with the latter. Just as in Great Britain the Scottish Sternhold and Hopkins, which was musically superior to the English version, was driven into the background by the latter's popularity, so in New England the vogue of the 'Bay Psalm-Book' was fatal to all rivals.

Another reason, more essential and practically potent, was the fact that Ainsworth represented a freer use of verse-forms than either Sternhold and Hopkins or the 'Bay Psalm-Book.' A large section of its tunes, therefore, did not fit the meters of the latter books. The 17th century, we recall, was the time when 'Common Meter' became regnant — in some quarters exclusive. The 'Bay Psalm-Book' used only six meters, and c.m. was put forward in four out of every five cases. At least fifteen of the Ainsworth tunes were thereby ruled out altogether, among them some of the best.

A third reason was the steadily declining interest among English-speaking Protestants in the technique of congregational song. This made it hard on either side of the water to maintain tunes of the length and variety of those in Ainsworth. What was the condition in England is well set forth in chap. iii. of Lightwood's Hymn-Tunes and their Story (1905), and, remembering how scattered and primitive were the focal points of culture in the American colonies till the 18th century, we may be sure that here conditions were infinitely less favorable. In 1692 the Plymouth Church formally recognized the 'difficulties' of many of the Ainsworth tunes and granted permission for the substitution of easier ones from the New England Version.

There is perhaps another factor that merits a further word, even though it be hard to define without going into a special dissertation. When the Pilgrims came to Plymouth they were plainly still in that early ardor for Protestant ideas and practices that had marked all similar bodies throughout the 16th century. Public worship as an institution was not only revered, but intensely loved, since it was the visible manifestation of the spiritual fraternity of believers in the presence and thought of God. It was known to be a positive means of grace largely because in it and through it the democratic congregationality of the brotherhood came to definite expression. Its heart and core was that body of common prayer and praise which was felt to be in a true sense sacramental, and to which what we call 'preaching' was meant to contribute. Hence resulted the extraordinary respect that was paid to everything connected with the congregational exercises of prayer and praise, as well as their great extension in the regular services. Although sermons were long, the prayers and the psalms were at least as long, probably often longer. Every service included two extended prayers, one by the 'pastor' and the other by the 'teacher', and two liberal selections from the Psalter, which was sung through in order from first to last in the course of some period like a year. As a little token of how the psalmody was regarded, it is said that for a long time if during the week one were passing a house where some one within was humming a snatch of a psalm-tune, the chance hearer took off his hat as a devout Italian uncovers when a procession passes bearing a bit of the consecrated Host.

But in America, as in England, there began in the 17th century that impressive and lamentable change in liturgical emphasis through which ministeriality was exalted over congregationality, bringing with it in public worship the gradual dominance over everything of the sermon, often as a display of intellectual prowess.

In consequence, the congregation came to regard its function as less that of activity, and sank into the attitude of the passive recipient, if not that of the captious critic. We to-day suffer grievously from the fruits of this insidious process of change. But the immediate musical result was the debilitation and flattening out of everything connected with congregational song. Such fresh and hearty tunes as Bradford and Winslow knew were bound to disappear. They cost too much in the way of concentration of effort and warmth of inner impulse. They were the voice of an age and a spirit that were beginning to pass away. In the 18th century, and at intervals later, there have been instinctive movements to recover the original liturgical fervor of youthful Protestantism. But none of these have lasted long or proved conspicuously effective, since none of them has quite gone to the root of the matter. That root, it is obvious, lies imbedded in many complex conditions and conceptions that do not belong at all in the realm of music, though they sometimes display their consequences within that realm.

However these things may be, we to-day may well stand in reverent interest before whatever serves to bring before us the spirit of those early days when for an entire congregation to sing together with full heart and voice was counted one of the finest and most precious of privileges.

It may be well to add a few hints as to the varied literature bearing upon the subject of the foregoing discussion.

Regarding the Pilgrims in particular and the total Puritan movement, with which they were more or less involved, a multitude of books have been published. None of these, however, so far as I am aware, treats in detail of the music here under consideration. Dexter's The England and Holland of the Pilgrims, 1905, contains many items about Ainsworth and his relation to the churches in Holland. Miss Earle's The Sabbath in New England, 1891, has an extended chapter upon Ainsworth's Psalter, but this is not entirely satisfactory or trustworthy, especially as regards the verse and the music. On the other hand, in Publications of the Colonial Society of Mass., i. 228-38, is an excellent and accurate paper by S. Lothrop Thorndike on 'The Psalmodies of Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay' which does real justice to Ainsworth's use of French melodies.

Regarding the intricate development of the early English Psalters the best information is given in Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology, 1892 (revised, 1907), under 'Psalters, English', 'Psalters, French', 'Old Version', 'Scottish Hymnody', etc. Numerous lesser works on hymnody supply some points, though often without precision.

Regarding the early Psalm-tunes, reference may be had to popular books like Lightwood's Hymn-Tunes and their Story, 1905, Curwen's excellent Studies in Worship-Music, 1st Series, 1880 (3rd ed., 1901) and Love's Scottish Church Music, 1891. Of the greatest importance are the elaborate dissertations in Livingston's The Scottish Metrical Psalter of 1635, 1864. The more comprehensive general treatises, like Douen's Clément Marot et le Psautier Huguenot, 1878-79, will mostly be found listed in Julian, though their number is still growing. Some points, also, can be traced in German authorities, such as Kümmerle's Encyclopädie der evangelischen Kirchenmusik, 1888-95, though these seldom do full justice to matters outside the German field.

Regarding the course of Psalmody in America there are such handbooks as Hood's History of Music in New England, 1846, Ritter's unsympathetic Music in America, 1883 (revised, 1890), Elson's History of American Music, 1904 (revised, 1915), and articles on 'Bay Psalm-Book' and 'Tune-Books' in Grove's Dictionary of Music, Vol. vi (American Supplement), 1920.

Many statements in the notes appended to the melodies following are based upon Livingston or Douen.

1. To the mayster of the musk upon Gittith; a Psalm of David.

2. Iehovah our Lord, how wondrous-excellent is thy name in al the earth:
which hast given thy glorious-majesty,
above the heavens.

3. Out-of the mouth of babes, & sucklings, thou hast founded strength;
because of thy-distressers: to make cease
the enemy, & self-avenger.

4. When I behold thy heavens, the deed of thy fingers: the moon and the starrs, which thou hast stably-constituted.

5. What is sory-man that thou re-membrest him: and the son of Adam,
that thou-visitest him?

6. For thou hast made-him-lesser a little, than the Gods: and crowned him with glory and comely-honour.

7. Thou gavest-him-dominion, over the works of thy hands: all, thou didst-set under his feet.

8. Sheep and oxen al of them: and also, the beasts of the feild.

9. The fowl of the heavens, & the fishes of the sea: that-which-passeth-through, the pathes of the seas.

10. Iehovah our Lord: how wondrous-excellent is thy name,
in al the earth.

2. O

Iah our Lord, how excellent-great is thy name in all the earth: thou which hast given thy glorious-majesty above the heaven.

3. Frō mouth of babes, & sucklings, thou swimmes

foundedst; because of them that thee distress:

To make the foe, and self-avenger cease:

4. *When I behold thy heav'ns, thy fingers deed:
the moon and starrs, which thou hast stablished.*

5. *What is frail-man that him thou remembrest?
and Adams son, that him thou visitest?*

6. *For thou a little lesser hast made him, than be the Gods: and crown'd him with glorie
and-eke with honourable-decencie.*

7. *Of thy hand-Works, thou gavest him ruling:
under his feet, thou set didst every-thing.*

8. *Sheep & beeves all: and fild beasts with the fowl of the heav'ns, fish of the sea also: (same,
that through the path-Wayes of the seas dooth go,*

10. O Iah our Lord: how excellent-great fame in all the earth hath thy renouned-name.

Annotations.

B. 1. Gittith] of the Gittith: which title is also given to the 81. & 84. Psalmes. Gath in Debye is a vinepress, Isa. 63. 1. It is also the name of a city of the Philistines, 1 Sam. 17. 4. A title also of the Levites was cald Gath-rimmon Ios. 21. 25. Whereupon Obed-edom the son of Jeduthun, a Levite and singer in Israel, was cald a Gittite. 2. Sam. 6. 10. So by Gittith here may be meant, either such instruments as were used by the posterity of Obed-edom the Gittite; or, that these Psalmes were made upon occasion of transporting Gods ark from the house of that Obed-edom, the history whereof is in 2. Sam. 6. 6. 10. 11. 12. &c. or, that these Psalmes were to be sung for praise of God, at the Vintage, when grapes were pressed. And according to this, the Syech translateth it the winepresses. Or it may be the name of some musical instrument; and so the Chaldee paraphrast taketh it.

THE thirty-nine melodies in Ainsworth are given herewith, accompanied in each case by some single stanza of the words regularly used. For convenience, they are transcribed in modern notation, using the G-clef instead of the C-clef, and representing ♩ by ♩, ♪ by ♪ and ♫ by ♫ (though properly ♩). The pitch indicated is that of the original, though the change of clefs transposes it an octave upward. When a flat occurs in the signature, or as an accidental, it is reproduced. In cases where contemporaneous books show that sharps were introduced in singing, they are indicated above the staff. Where a sharp may be conjectured, but is not thus supported by evidence, it is put in parenthesis. Some problematical cases are further indicated by a query.

The original music is without bars, except to mark the end of the tune. The ends of the lines are more or less consistently indicated by 'checks', which are here reproduced by a mark at the top of the staff. In the original the tunes have the time-signature ♩, with the exception of five cases (42, 45, 50, 51, 111). It seems evident that this indicates in general what was sometimes called 'alla semibreve' or 'alla cappella' time. But its application in many cases is by no means clear, since the rhythmic feet are triple rather than duple. It is important to remember that in some books of the periods such feet were made duple by dotting the long notes. Whether this alteration was common in actual singing is unknown.

In selecting single stanzas to go with the melodies the aim was to take those that are somewhat complete in thought and fairly finished in expression. The original spelling is retained, but not the punctuation.

With each tune a few brief notes are subjoined, recalling points about its derivation and previous usage or emphasizing features in the melody that are worth observing. These latter remarks mainly concern the modes used or the line-rhythms or the modulations implied or the melodic devices, including cadence-formulæ. These notes are by no means all that might be made, but they will serve to bring out some of the salient technical points.

PSALMS I and 68 (also 4, 11, 19, 76, 98, 110, 121, 127, 144). C. M. D.

O blessed man, that dooth not in
The wicked's counsel walk
Nor stand in synner's way, nor sit
In seat of scornful folk,
But setteth in Jehovah's law
His pleasureful delight,
And in His law dooth meditate
By day and eke by night.

[Ps. I]

In Sternhold and Hopkins, both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 119. Appeared in the partial London Psalter of 1560 with Whittingham's new version of that Psalm.

Rhythm of line a found elsewhere only in 7e.

Line g is tonally the same as 34*f*.

Lines c-d modulate into the dominant minor, and f into the relative major.

PSALMS 3 and 86 (also 6, 55, 119, 120). 10s.

I layd me down and slept; I waking rose;
 For me Jehovah firmly up did bear.
 For thowsands ten of folk I wil not fear,
 Which me besetting round about inclose.

[Ps. 3]

The only melody in 10s that has a uniform line-rhythm, which is the commonest form for 10-syllable lines. It can be regarded as laid out in either $2\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{1}{2}$ measures. The latter pattern (the first of three beats divided) was a favorite with Lowell Mason, though used by him for shorter lines.

Line a curiously resembles the opening of a tune set to Ps. 74 in the Genevan Psalter of 1562, though the latter is in major. But the rest of the two melodies are quite different. (See Douen, i. 661.)

Line b modulates into the dominant minor, perhaps throughout.

PSALM 5. L. M.

And all that hope in Thee for stay
 Shal joy, shal showt eternallie;
 And Thou shalt cover them; and they
 That love Thy name, be glad in Thee. [Ps. 5]

In Scottish S&H. (from 1595) set to the versified Ten Commandments. It comes from the Genevan Psalter of 1556.

The rhythm of a is unique in the juxtaposition of duple and triple feet. But it is possible that in singing the latter were made duple by dotting the minims. This adjustment often occurs in Este's harmonized Psalter of 1592.

Line c probably modulates into the dominant major.

The echo between b and d is effective.

PSALM 7 and 74 (also 10, 14, 16, 83, 90, 116, 143). C. M. D.

Jehovah, Thou wilt quicken me
Ev'n for Thyne own name's sake;
Thou in Thy justice forth my sowl
Out of distress wilt take.
And in Thy mercie wilt suppress
My foes, and al of them
Destroy that doo afflict my sowl;
For I Thy servant am.

[Ps. 143]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 130. It comes from the Genevan Psalter of 1542, and is also in the Strassburg Psalter of 1539.

The peculiar rhythm of ϵ recalls $1a$.

Other versions do not agree as to the second and third sharps. In the 1629 English book both are included and g ends with b-natural. The intended harmonic scheme is in doubt, but analogy suggests that the three sharps should be kept, but not the natural. The modulations, then, would be the usual ones, into the dominant minor and the relative major.

PSALM 8 (also 17, 23, 35, 77, 85, 92, 124). 10s, 5 lines.

Our sowl is as a bird escaped free
 From out of the intangling fowler's snare.
 The snare is broke and we escaped are.
 Our succour in Jehovah's name shal bee
 That of the heav'ns and earth is the maker. [Ps. 124]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 124. It was taken in 1560 from the Genevan Psalter of 1559, but first appeared in 1551. It is attributed to Louis Bourgeois, but the traditional harmony is Goudimel's. It is now commonly reduced to four lines by omitting c. This modified version, often with changed rhythm and the second cadence inverted, is usually called 'Toulon'.

The rhythm of c is unique, though the 'snap' effect is paralleled in 18*b*.

PSALM 13 (also 88, 130). 6s, 9 lines.

I counted am with them
 That doo go down the pit;
 I am as man that hath
 Abilitie no whit.
 Ev'n free among the dead,
 As slayn in grave that lay,
 Whom Thou dost mind no more,
 Because from Thy hand they
 Have quite been cut away.

[Ps. 88]

Apparently Dorian, though the practical treatment is not clear. Modulation into the dominant minor is likely in b and d, and probably into the relative major in e-f.

The rather unusual pairs of notes in e and f may point to derivation from 4-note lines, possibly an immature stage of the stanza later called 'Hallelujah Meter' (6666, 4444). cf. the form of Ps. 108.

PSALM 15 (also 131). C. M.

Jehovah, who shal sojourner
In Thy pavilion bee?
Who shal a dweller be within
Thy mount of sanctitie?

[Ps. 15]

This simple 'short' tune sounds like those later known as 'common' tunes (tunes in C. M. adaptable to any Psalm in that meter). But I have not identified it as such.

The rhythms are all different. That of a is unique, while those of b and c are elsewhere found only in 54*b* and 89*c* respectively.

Line b seems to modulate into the relative major.

PSALMS 18 and 69 (also 2, 38, 45, 52, 63, 72, 107, 140). 10s, 6 lines.

I love Thee deer, Jehovah my firmness;
 Jehovah is my rock and my fortress,
 And my deliverer, my God is Hee,
 My rock, in whom I sheltred hope to bee
 My shield and horn of my salvation,
 My fensed hye fortification.

[Ps. 18]

This extended and individual tune I have not yet identified in other books. It may be conceived without modulation. But the unique cadence in c is surprising, and that of e is ambiguous. I incline to read f-sharp throughout, but with hesitation in c.

The rhythm of f is unique, and that of b found only in 25*a* and 55*b* (both tunes of French origin).

The device of beginning with three reiterated notes, as in a and c, occurs also in 25*b*, 37*d*, 42*a*, 50*cd*, 51*ac*, 55*efh*, 60*d*, 78*e*, 84*gh*, 100*b* and 119*efg*. All these, except possibly 42, are probably French.

PSALM 21 (also 93, 134). S. M.

Jehovah, in Thy strength
 Doo high Thyself advance;
 And we wil sing and praise with psalm
 Thy powrful puissance.

[Ps. 21]

This melody resembles that for Ps. 54, though the latter is in C. M. and is tonally identical only in spots. The 'common' tune called 'London' in the Scottish S&H. ('Cambridge' in the English) of 1615 and '35 consists of 54*ab* + 21*cd*. This tune, in some one of its varying forms, is at least as old as Damon's Psalter of 1577. It is supposed to be of English origin (see Livingston, passim). It is not to be confused with 'London New' or 'Newtown'.

The rhythm of c, combining duple and triple feet, occurs elsewhere only in 54*c*. But see note under Ps. 5.

PSALM 22 (also 19). C. M. D.

Jehovah's law, it perfect is,
 The sowl agayn turning;
 Jehovah's witness faithful is,
 The simple wise making;
 Jehovah's charges righteous are,
 Giving hart's glad delight;
 Jehovah's precept, it is pure,
 Giving the eyes clear light.

[Ps. 19]

In S&H., English, the 'proper' tune for the versified Te Deum. As it is there given without sharps, it seems to alternate between D minor and F major. It is there divided more definitely into lines than here.

The rhythm of g, as here given, is unique, though much like that of 1a and 7c.

Line b perhaps modulates into the dominant minor.

The strong cadences of d and h are paralleled in 27a and 75e.

PSALM 24 (also 29, 118). C. M. D.

Lift up, ye gates, your heads, and ye,
 Doors of eternal aye,
 Be lifted up, that so the King
 Of glory enter may!
 This King of glory, who is He?
 Jehovah, puissant
 And valiant, Jehovah, He
 In battel valiant.

[Ps. 24]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 77. In the English version also set for Pss. 81 and 135. Its origin is probably English.

The steady triple feet in the 8-syllable lines are paralleled only in Ps. 32. The peculiar 'snap' rhythm of the 6-syllable lines is found only in 54*d*.

The only certain modulation is that of d into the dominant major, though passing into the relative minor is feasible in b and f.

The subtle echoes between parallel lines in the couplets and quatrains are interesting.

PSALM 25 (also 9, 37, 62, 71, 123). 10s.

Upon Jehovah turn thy way aright,
 And trust on Him, and He wil see it doon;
 And wil bring forth thy justice as the light,
 And thy judgment as the bright shining noon. [Ps. 37]

Set in Genevan Psalters (from at least 1542) to Ps. 8, but in the meter 11-11-10-10 (penultimate note in a and b divided.)

The rhythm of a occurs only in 18*b* and 55*b*, while that of d is unique.

Line b doubtless modulates into the relative major. The use of the flat in c, but not in a, suggests that a is conceived as ending in the dominant minor.

PSALMS 27 and 106 (also 30, 36, 101, 109, 115). C. M. D.

Jehovah, in the heavens is
 Thy bountiful mercie;
 Thy constant faithfulness dooth reach
 Unto the hiest skye.
 Thy justice, as the mounts of God;
 Thy judgments, a great deep;
 Jehovah, Thou doost man and beast
 In helthful safety keep.

[Ps. 36]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 18. It is supposed to be of English origin.

Lines a-b, here treated as a couplet, are divided in the music for Ps. 106.

The only modulation is in e, into the dominant minor.

On the cadence in a, see Ps. 22.

PSALM 32 (also 28, 40, 70, 75, 102, 137). L. M. D.

Jehovah's song how sing shal wee
 Within a forreyn people's land?
 Jerusalem, if I doo thee
 Forget, forget let my right hand,
 Cleav let my tongue to my palat,
 If I doo not in mind thee bear,
 If I Jerusalem doo not
 Above my chieftest joy prefer.

[Ps. 137]

In S&H., English, set to 'The Lamentation of a Sinner', one of the few appended hymns. Its origin is doubtless English.

The triple movement recalls that of Ps. 24.

Line c probably modulates into the relative major, as e and f certainly do into the dominant minor.

With suitable harmony, as supplied, for example, in Este's Psalter of 1592, this apparently monotonous lament takes on a singularly haunting beauty.

PSALMS 33, 81 and 104 (also 47, 114, 148). L. M.

He brings forth bread out of the ground,
 And joyes the hart of man with wine;
 Makes face with oil chearful to shine,
 With bread man's heart upholdeth sound.

[Ps. 104]

The only melody in what appears to be the Æolian mode. If conceived in A minor, b modulates into the relative major.
 The rhythms of a and c are unique.

PSALM 34 (also 82, 133, 149). L. M., 6 lines.

Who is the man that life dooth will,
 That loveth dayes, good for to see?
 Refreyning keep thy tongue from yll,
 Thy lips from speaking fallacee.
 Doo good and evil quite eschew,
 Seek peace and after it pursew.

[Ps. 34]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for the versified Lord's Prayer, and in the Scottish version also set for Ps. 112. It is the famous German melody 'Vater unser', dating from at least as early as 1537. It came into English use from Geneva by 1560, if not earlier.

The peculiar effect of the five long notes at the ends of lines is unique.

Line f is tonally the same as 1g.

PSALMS 35 and 77 (also 17, 31, 85, 92, 129, 142). 108, 5 lines.

Say to my sowl, I thy salvation am.

Let my sowl-seekers basht and shamed be,

Turnd back and blush, that evil think for me.

As chaff before the wind, so be those same,

And th'Angel of Jehovah driving them.

[Ps. 35]

The rhythm of a, c and d is found elsewhere only in 37*a* and 45*a*.

Lines c and d appear to modulate into the dominant minor and the relative major respectively.

PSALM 37 (also 52, 61, 78, 97). 105.

Frett not thyself for them that evil doon;
 Envie not them that doo injuriousnes;
 For as the grass cut down they shal be soon,
 And fade ev'n as the budding herb's greennes. [Ps. 37]

Probably major, with modulations in a and c into the subdominant and dominant majors.

The rhythm of a occurs also in 35*acd* and 45*a*. That of b is found only in 53*aef*.

The duplication of cadences in b and d is noticeable.

PSALM 39 (also 41, 141). C. M. D.

Fyre in my meditation burnd;
 I with my tongue did speak.
 Jehovah, make me know mine end,
 What my dayes' mesure eke;
 Know let me how short liv'd I am.
 Loe, Thou hast giv'n my dayes
 As handbrethts, and my worldly time
 Fore Thee as nothing weighes.

[Ps. 39]

This cheerful and simple melody has no special originality to the modern ear, but may have been unusual in its day. The apparent avoidance of modulations tends toward monotony, but is offset by the lilting rhythms. Line f is somewhat striking.

Cadences in falling thirds, as in a and f, are unusual in this series, especially in major.

PSALM 42 (also 43). C. M. D.

Like as the hinde for water-streams
 Dooth bray desirouslie,
 Ev'n so desirouslie dooth bray
 My sowl, O God, to Thee.
 For God, ev'n for the living God,
 My sowl it thirsteth sore;
 O when shal I come and appear
 The face of God before?

[Ps. 42]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 69, but c-d are not united in a couplet. In the Scottish version no f-sharp is marked in c. Its origin is supposed to be English.

Line e modulates into the relative major. Line c is open to more than one interpretation.

The two pairs of identical cadences are noticeable.

PSALM 44 (also 46, 48). C. M. D.

The nations did make a noyse,
 The kingdoms moved were;
 Give forth did He His thondring voice,
 The earth did melt with fear.
 The God of armies is with us,
 The everbeing Jah;
 The God of Jakob is for us,
 A refuge hye. Selah.

[Ps. 46]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 44. It comes from the Genevan Psalter of 1556.

It is somewhat peculiar for the repetition of figures and cadences, and the avoidance of modulation. Its rhythms, too, are uniform.

PSALM 45 (also 53, 58, 72, 95, 96, 103, 111, 147). 108, 6 lines.

Come, let us to the Lord showt joyfully,
 To Rock of our health showt triumphantly.
 Let us prevent His face with thanksgiving,
 Let us with psalms to Him triumphant sing.
 Because the Lord is a great God mightie,
 A great King eke, above al gods is Hee.

[Ps. 95]

The combination of rhythms is remarkable. That of a is found in 35*acd* and 37*a*, but the others are unique. Line f has 11 notes, requiring a slur (not elsewhere in this series except in 111*c*).

Line e modulates into the dominant minor. In the other lines the key may play back and forth somewhat.

PSALM 50 (also 12, 73, 126). 108 & 118.

For ech beast of the wood to Me perteyns,
 The beasts that on a thousand mountayns bee.
 I know al flying fowls of the mountayns,
 And store of wild beasts of the field with Mee.
 If I were hungry, thee I would not tell it,
 For myne the world and plenty that dooth fyll it. [Ps. 50]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 50. It came into English use from the Genevan Psalter of 1559, along with Whittingham's version of that Psalm. The sharp in e is not in the Scottish version.

The only melody in the series (except the redundant 45*f*) with 'feminine' endings, as in e and f.

Line b, and possibly e as well, modulates into the dominant minor.

The duplication of c and d is somewhat singular. Was this originally a 5-line tune?

PSALM 51. L. M. D.

O God, be gracious to me
According unto Thy kindness;
As Thy compassions many bee,
Wipe Thou away my trespasses.
Much wash me from my perversenes,
And from my syn me purifie.
My trespasses for know doo I,
And my syn 'fore me alway is.

[Ps. 51]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 51. It came from the Genevan Psalter of 1556.

Line d apparently modulates into the relative major. The sharp in e is not used in the Scottish version, perhaps implying the same key.

The duplication in lines b and g, and the likeness of six of the cadences, catch attention.

PSALM 53 (also 56, 64). 10s, 6 lines.

God, hear my voice when I doo pray to Thee;
 Preserve my life from dread of th'enemie.
 From secret of yll-doers hide Thou mee,
 From rage of them that work iniquitie,
 Which have their tongue sharp-whetted as a sword,
 Have bent their arrow, ev'n a bitter word. [Ps. 64]

The peculiar rhythm of a, e and f is found only in 37*b*.
 Lines a and d modulate into the dominant minor and e into the relative major.

The successive skips at the opening of b are unusual.

PSALM 54. C. M.

O God, Thou in Thy name me save,
And in Thy pow'r judge me.
O God, my prayer hear; to words
Of my mouth heedful be.

[Ps. 54]

See notes under Ps. 21.

PSALM 55 (also 62, 71, 80, 94). 103, D.

Mine hart is payned in the mids of me;
 Terrours of death eke falln upon me be.
 Fear is into me come and trembling dread,
 And quaking horror hath me covered.
 So that I say, Who wil give me a wing,
 As dove, that I might flye and find dwelling?
 Loe, wandering flight I would make farr away;
 Lodge would I in the wildernes. Selah.

[Ps. 55]

The traditional melody in early French Psalters for Ps. 103. It occurs as far back as the Strassburg Psalter of 1539.

The rhythm of a, d and e occurs only in 119*a*, that of b only in 18*b* and 25*a*, and that of g is unique.

Apparently, line b modulates into the subdominant major, and e and perhaps g into the dominant minor.

The bold motion at two or three points is notable.

PSALM 59 (also 79). C. M. D.

But I will sing Thy strength and show
 At morning Thy kindness;
 For Thou my fense and refuge art
 In day of my distress.
 O Thou that art my fortitude,
 To Thee sing psalm wil I;
 For God mine hye munition is,
 The God of my mercie.

[Ps. 59]

Found in both forms of S&H., in the English set to 'The Humble Suite of a Sinner' (one of the added hymns), and in the Scottish the 'proper' tune for Ps. 35 (but with the last three lines quite different).

Probably is to be thought without modulation.

PSALM 60 (also 57, 65, 67, 113, 145). L. P. M.

O blessed he whom Thou doost make Choise of, and neer unto Thee take
 In Thy courts to have dwelling-place.
 With good things that in Thine howse bee
 Ful satisfied be shal wee,
 With holy things of Thy pallace.

[Ps. 65]

All but line b closely corresponds to a melody set for Ps. 24 in the Genevan Psalter of 1542.

The 'snap' rhythms in a and d are unique.

Line b modulates into the dominant minor.

It is to be noted that the verse is in triolets, as in Ps. 84.

PSALM 66 (also 26). L. M.

PSALM 75 (also 70, 105, 132, 138). L. M. D.

With al my hart I'le Thee confess
 Before the gods to Thee sing psalme;
 To pallace of Thy holynes
 I'le bow down and confess Thy name
 For Thy mercie and veritee.
 For Thow Thy word hast magnified
 'Bove al Thy name. Thou answ'redest mee
 Then in the day wherin I cried.

[Ps. 138]

In S&H., Scottish, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 91, being derived from French Psalters of 1559 and 1561.

The rhythm of b and d is unique and peculiar.

These lines modulate into the dominant minor, and f into the relative major.

PSALM 78 (also 49, 80, 91, 94). 108, D.

Thou shalt not fear for terrour of the night,
 Nor for the arrow that by day makes flight;
 For pest that in the darknes maketh way,
 For stinging plague that wasteth at noon-day.
 Falln at thy side though thowsand thowsands bee
 At thy right hand, it shal not come neer thee.
 Onely thou with thine eyes shalt give regard,
 And thou shalt see the wicked men's reward.

[Ps. 91]

I have not identified this melody elsewhere. It is almost certainly French. The rhythms are uniform throughout, exactly like those of Ps. 111. Line a modulates into the dominant minor. The problem of how far to introduce sharps recalls that in Ps. 18. The cadence of e is like that of 18*c*.

PSALM 84 and 136 (also 20, 67, 113). L. P. M. D. or 8s & 7s, D.

Confess Jehovah thankfully,
 For He is good, for His mercy
 Continueth for ever.
 To God of gods confess doo yee,
 Because His bountiful-mercee
 Continueth for ever.
 Unto the Lord of lords confess,
 Because His merciful kindnes
 Continueth for ever.
 To Him that dooth Himself onely
 Things wondrous great, for His mercy
 Continueth for ever.

[Ps. 136]

This famous battle-song, which Douen calls 'the Huguenot Marseillaise', is traceable in French Psalters as far back as 1539, set first to Ps. 36, later to Ps. 68. Phrases from it may be found in early German chorales. In S&H., both forms, it is the 'proper' tune for Ps. 113. See Douen, i. 657-8

Its uniform rhythm is most telling in the form applied in Ps. 136.

This is the only Pilgrim melody, besides 'Old 100th' and 'Toulon', that I have noted in modern hymnals. In Hatfield's Church Hymn Book (1872) six of its lines are lamely given under the name 'Calvin'.

PSALM 89 (also 87, 99). C. M. D.

O blessed are the folk that know
 The trumpet's sounding shrille;
 Jehovah, in Thy face's light
 They shal walk forward stil.
 In Thy renoumed name they shal
 Be gladsom al the day;
 And in Thy justice righteous
 Exalted be shal they.

[Ps. 89]

In S&H., both forms, set to the versified Magnificat. Its origin is supposed to be English.

It is unique in its apparent harmonic structure. The first half seems to be in F major, but the second half in G minor.

The rhythms of c and e are unusual, as are the skips in e.

PSALM 97 (also 95, 146, 150). 108.

O praise Him with sound of the trumpet shril;
 Praise Him with harp and the psalterion;
 O praise Him with the flute and tymberel;
 Praise Him with virginals and organon!

[Ps. 150

This major melody has interesting points of general likeness, especially in movement, to the minor melody of Ps. 3.

Lines b and c modulate into the dominant major.

PSALM 100 (also 105). L. M.

Showt to Jehovah, al the earth;
Serv ye Jehovah with gladnes;
Before Him come with singing mirth;
Know that Jehovah He God is.

[Ps. 100]

In S&H., both forms, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 100. On its history, see article in Grove, Dictionary of Music, iii. 431-2.

The rhythms are to be noted in their difference from those later adopted and now universally employed.

The melody asserts its plagal range at once, which is unusual.

PSALM 108 (also 117, 122, 125, 128, 135). 6s & 4.

Jehovah, I wil Thee
 Confess the folks among,
 And in the nations
 I wil Thee praise with song.
 That Thy mercies
 Are great above heav'ns and
 Thy truth unto the skies.

[Ps. 108]

In S&H., Scottish, the 'proper' tune for Ps. 136, but there given without the flat in the signature. The insertion of this in Ainsworth seems to be an error.

As this is the only specimen of this odd meter, most of the rhythms are unique. Cf. note to Ps. 13.

Line b seems to modulate into the subdominant major, as d certainly does.

The opening is singularly bold and the reiteration of the four-note phrase in c and e is interesting.

PSALM III (also 112, 140, 147). 108, 6 lines.

O blessed man that dooth Jehovah fear,
 That greatly dooth in His commands delight.
 His seed in earth shal mighty persevere;
 Blessed shal be the race of the upright.
 In his house riches are and welthy store;
 His justice standeth eke for evermore.

[Ps. 112]

The unusual number of repeated notes suggests that perhaps this melody has been made out of one intended for lines with fewer syllables. The cadence in c is altogether unique.

Lines b and c probably both modulate into the dominant minor.

PSALM 119 (also 37, 49, 139). 108, D.

Behind and 'fore Thou doost me strait inclose;
 Upon me also doost Thy hand impose.
 This knowledge is too marvellous for me;
 It's high, to reach I shal not able be.
 O whither shal I from Thy spirit goe?
 And whither shal I flee Thy presence fro?
 If I clime up the heav'ns, Thou art there;
 Or make my bed in hel, loe, Thou art there.

[Ps. 139]

This fine long melody presents considerable general likeness to that for Ps. 84. In the Genevan Psalters from 1549 it became the regular tune for Ps. 32.

The rhythm of a occurs only in 55*ade*.

Lines e and g probably modulate into the dominant major.

IT seems clear that behind the majority of these melodies stood a harmonic feeling substantially like that of to-day.

This appears not only from the general form of the melodies themselves, but from comparison with the harmonies supplied for the same or similar melodies in sundry harmonized versions dating from before and after 1612. It is enough to refer to the settings of Daye and Este in England, issued in 1563 and 1592 respectively, and to those of the Scottish version of 1635. While certain of the details in all these are not exactly what we should now instinctively use, and there are others now common that are not yet attempted, there is no radical difference of procedure. Whatever may have been the crudity or timidity of practice in other forms of music at the opening of the 16th century, the treatment of folk-song airs was already well settled upon the lines that have been recognized ever since.

This general fact gives ample warrant for the application of harmony to these melodies, both to bring out some of their latent musical life, and to make them serviceable for choral or instrumental reproduction. Exactly how this is to be done, however, may be debated. It is likely that every musician, as he looks over the material here presented, will have his own notion of how he would prefer to handle it. It is obvious that almost every phrase is open to more than one treatment. And just how far it is wise to go in the employment of various devices of chord-succession and voice-part leading that are now frequent is a matter requiring both taste and judgment.

In many cases, also, the exact reading of the melodies is in doubt. Except where other books supply the accepted usage, Ainsworth leaves us without sure indication of the use of sharps. This lack is constant in the formation of cadences and sometimes in the harmonic sense of entire lines. One melody, at least, that for Psalm 37, can be regarded throughout in either of two keys. And those melodies that are apparently cast upon the framework of the old church modes require special consideration. Several of them are almost impossible to conceive in quite our modern idiom. As a specimen, Psalm 33 is given without any deviation from the mode.

It has seemed wise to include in the present study some harmonized versions of representative melodies, choosing those that are on the whole most obvious or most otherwise serviceable. The treatment offered aims to preserve a fair degree of the original effect and at the same time keep in with our more modern feeling. Instead of using the same formula for similar figures in the melodies, somewhat varied handling has been introduced.

It is clear that the customary modulations are those indicated in the preceding notes — especially in minor into the relative major or the dominant minor — but there are cases where the exact process presents some difficulty. Whether or not in these and other particulars what is offered is a wise solution, the general experiment of giving a part of the songs in harmony is worth making.

I make no attempt to divide the phrases into measures. Some of them, no doubt, can be easily arranged thus. But others present difficulties, especially in the mingling of duple with triple note-groups and in the surprising frequency of a syncopated accent that amounts to an emphatic 'snap', sometimes kept up for more than one note. My impression is that the true rendering requires attention to the flow of each phrase as a whole with respect to the accent of the verse, and that a certain elasticity or freedom of rhythm is to be sought. It is very doubtful whether any rigid 'keeping of time' should be made conspicuous. Rather the essential character of each phrase and group of phrases should be studied and brought out by intuitive sympathy. It is probable that in the early singing the pace was fairly quick and the accents strong.

Simply as a means of making reproduction easier, some melodies have been transposed.

A stanza of words is given as in the preceding pages.

PSALM I. C. M. D.

O blessed man, that dooth not in
 The wicked's counsel walk
 Nor stand in synner's way, nor sit
 In seat of scornful folk,
 But setteth in Jehovah's law
 His pleasureful delight,
 And in His law dooth meditate
 By day and eke by night.

[Ps. 1]

PSALMS 3. IOS.

I layd me down and slept; I waking rose;
For me Jehovah firmly up did bear.
For thowsands ten of folk I wil not fear,
Which me besetting round about inclose.

[Ps. 3]

PSALM 97 IOS.

O praise Him with sound of the trumpet shril;
Praise Him with harp and the psalterion;
O praise Him with the flute and tymberel;
Praise Him with virginals and organon!

[Ps. 150]

PSALM 24. C. M. D.

Lift up, ye gates, your heads, and ye,
 Doors of eternal aye,
 Be lifted up, that so the King
 Of glory enter may!
 This King of glory, who is He?
 Jehovah, puissant
 And valiant, Jehovah, He
 In battel valiant.

[Ps. 24]

PSALM 5. L. M.

And all that hope in Thee for stay
 Shal joy, shal showt eternallie;
 And Thou shalt cover them; and they
 That love Thy name, be glad in Thee. [Ps. 5]

PSALM 15. C. M.

Jehovah, who shal sojourner
 In Thy pavilion bee?
 Who shal a dweller be within
 Thy mount of sanctitie? [Ps. 15]

PSALM 32. L. M. D.

Jehovah's song how sing shal wee
 Within a forreyn people's land?
 Jerusalem, if I doo thee
 Forget, forget let my right hand.
 Cleav let my tongue to my palat,
 If I doo not in mind thee bear,
 If I Jerusalem doo not
 Above my chiefest joy prefer.

[Ps. 137]

PSALM 21. S. M.

Jehovah, in Thy strength
Doo high Thyself advance;
And we wil sing and praise with psalm
Thy powrful puissance.

[Ps. 21]

PSALM 33. L. M.

He brings forth bread out of the ground,
And joyes the hart of man with wine;
Makes face with oil chearful to shine,
With bread man's heart upholdeth sound.

[Ps. 104]

PSALM 39. C. M. D.

Fyre in my meditation burnd;
 I with my tongue did speak.
 Jehovah, make me know mine end,
 What my dayes' mesure eke;
 Know let me how short liv'd I am.
 Loe, Thou hast giv'n my dayes
 As handbredths, and my worldly time
 Fore Thee as nothing weighes.

[Ps. 39]

PSALM 25. IOS.

Upon Jehovah turn thy way aright,
And trust on Him, and He wil see it doon;
And wil bring forth thy justice as the light,
And thy judgment as the bright shining noon. [Ps. 37]

PSALM 37. IOS.

Frett not thyself for them that evil doon;
Envie not them that doo injuriousnes;
For as the grass cut down they shal be soon,
And fade ev'n as the budding herb's greenes. [Ps. 37]

PSALM 44. C. M. D.

The nations did make a noyse,
 The kingdoms moved were;
 Give forth did He His thondring voice,
 The earth did melt with fear.
 The God of armies is with us,
 The everbeing Jah;
 The God of Jakob is for us,
 A refuge hye. Selah.

[Ps. 46]

PSALM 108. 6s, 4.

Jehovah, I wil Thee
Confess the folks among,
And in the nations
I wil Thee praise with song.
That Thy mercies
Are great above heav'ns and
Thy truth unto the skies.

[Ps. 108]

PSALM 84. L. P. M. D.

Confess Jehovah thankfully,
 For He is good, for His mercy
 Continueth for ever.
 To God of gods confess doo yee,
 Because His bountiful-mercee
 Continueth for ever.
 Unto the Lord of lords confess,
 Because His merciful kindnes
 Continueth for ever.
 To Him that dooth Himself onely
 Things wondrous great, for His mercy
 Continueth for ever.

[Ps. 136]

PSALM 119. 108, D.

Behind and 'fore Thou doost me strait inclose;
 Upon me also doost Thy hand impose.
 This knowledge is too marveilous for me;
 It's high, to reach I shal not able be.
 O whither shal I from Thy spirit goe?
 And whither shal I flee Thy presence fro?
 If I clime up the heav'ns, Thou art there;
 Or make my bed in hel, loe, Thou art there.
